Think of something you wish we had a word for, I tell my students. If our experience flows through the current of language, then how do we live what we cannot say? What would you say if you could? A student says, a word for longing for someone who is in the same room. A word for the particular quiet of the house just after loved ones leave, the spare bed disheveled, extra cups by the sink, alluvial silt of tea still warm in the porcelain. One girl raises her hand: a word for the way we feel when people sing Happy Birthday to us. Yes—that annual blend of pleasure and embarrassment, the sombrero tilted on your head while the other patrons look up from their salted rims, the birthday candles beading blue wax while dad pans the camera around the glowing faces. I last heard the song four months ago just as my daughter pushed free of me. Dr. Wilson began to sing, the surprise of his baritone rising in the midst of both our cries, happy birthday, dear Eloise... her face purple and swollen, the slick curling cord that bound us then cut. I have often wondered what the doctor said when my sister gave birth to twins, one alive and one not. No song or word can sing into that abyssal joy, that sorrow. A word for the prayer of pure praise wedded to sheer anguish. A word for longing for someone who is in the same body.

How often I’d longed for my daughter those nine months, even as she turned and stirred beneath my hands, only as far away as my skin is deep. Perhaps there is no word that is not longing. When my sister and I are silent together on the phone, I can’t help but think of the Mars Rover, 280 million miles away rolling slowly through a crater of red rock and dust, singing Happy Birthday to itself.

This is how my sister will always feel when she sings that song to her son—both elegy and ode, a tune that rises from the dark depth of a place no one can go with her or follow her out of, even if she promises not to look back. A word for praise struck from the flint of sorrow. A word for longing for someone who is in the same cosmos.

A word for the look of the earth as glimpsed from Mars, twinned in its spinning, unsayable and green in its faraway light.
